The Golden Grain of Rice

I walked from door to door
along the village road, a beggar looking for alms.
In the distance I could see your golden coach glistening as in a dream.
I asked myself
who this king of kings might be.
My hopes surged, and it seemed that all my dreary days
had vanished.
I stood, awaiting alms—given without asking;
Riches scattered in the dust.

The coach stopped right next to me.
Your glance fell upon me.
You descended from your coach with a smile.
I sensed that finally I was to be granted true happiness.

Then suddenly you opened your hand and said,
“What do you have to give m?”

Oh, what irony I thought—to beg from a beggar.
I was confused and stood dismayed,
not knowing what to do.
Out of my bag I slowly pulled the smallest grain of rice
and handed it to you.

Yet how great was my surprise,
when at the end of the day I emptied out my bag
and found among the grains that fell a tiny grain of gold
among a lot of worthless things

Tears welled up and with all my heart I wished that I had possessed the courage to have given you
ALL THAT I POSSESSED—MYSELF
