For the Farmer

Before the human mind could warm to itself,
The hands of the farmer had first to work;
Creating clearances in the earth's thicket;
Cut into the thorn screens of wild briar
Dig out loose rock until a field emerged
Whose clay could be loosened and softened
To take seed and bring forth crops.
His skilled hands can guide calves and lambs to birth,
Out among his animals in rain, cold and snow,
Talking to them in affectionate callings,
Something in him tuned to their rhythm. May the farmer continue to hold true ground, keeping the intimate knowledge of the clay alive, Nourishing us with the fruits of the earth, serving as custodian of that precious threshold where the rhythm of nature with its serene pulse and sublime patience restores our minds.
by John O'Donohue (from 'Benedictus' Bantam Press)
